

Vancouver Centre of Excellence

Research on Immigration and Integration in the Metropolis

Working Paper Series

No. 04-10

Global Minds, Local Bodies: Kosovar Transnational Connections Beyond
British Columbia

Kathy Sherrell and Jennifer Hyndman

May 2004

RIIM

Research on Immigration and Integration in the Metropolis

The Vancouver Centre is funded by grants from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, Citizenship & Immigration Canada, Simon Fraser University, the University of British Columbia and the University of Victoria. We also wish to acknowledge the financial support of the Metropolis partner agencies:

- Health Canada
- Human Resources Development Canada
- Department of Canadian Heritage
- Department of the Solicitor General of Canada
- Status of Women Canada
- Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation
- Correctional Service of Canada
- Immigration & Refugee Board

Views expressed in this manuscript are those of the author(s) alone. For more information, contact the Co-directors of the Centre, Dr. Daniel Hiebert, Department of Geography, UBC (e-mail: dhiebert@geog.ubc.ca) or Acting Co-Director, Dr. Jennifer Hyndman, Department of Geography, SFU (e-mail: hyndman@sfu.ca).

Global Minds, Local Bodies: Kosovar Transnational Connections Beyond
British Columbia

by

Kathy Sherrell
Dept. of Geography
Simon Fraser University
kmsherre@sfu.ca

and

and Jennifer Hyndman
Dept. of Geography
Simon Fraser University
8888 University Drive
Burnaby, BC V5A 1S6
hyndman@sfu.ca

May 2004

Funding for this research was provided by the Vancouver Centre of Excellence for Research on Immigration and Integration in the Metropolis (RIIM), as well as from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC) Strategic Grant on Social Cohesion in Canada (Social cohesion and international migration in globalizing era: transnational solidarities and newcomer incorporation in Canada).

Abstract: In 1999, nine hundred and five Kosovar refugees settled in British Columbia. Despite their sudden and forced departure, many have maintained contact with and returned to visit Kosovo/a. We contend that these transnational links are different for refugees than for other classes of immigrants. In this case, 'refugee transnationalism' refers to the social, cultural, economic and political relations that Kosovar refugees in Canada keep with those in Serbia and Montenegro (formerly the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia). A salient feature that shapes Kosovar transnationalism is the uncertain status of the region of origin, namely Kosovo/a. Based on interviews and focus groups with Kosovars in seven BC cities, we discuss the quality and distinctiveness of transnational links among this refugee group and their implications for settlement and integration in Canada.

Introduction

Resettlement to another country is often considered a ‘durable solution’ to displacement and the endpoint of the refugee experience. A refugee’s attachment to her region of origin does not simply end, however, once she arrives in a host society such as Canada. Achieving full participation in Canadian society is a long-term process influenced by events and expectations in the country of origin as well as the host country. “Immigrants take actions, make decisions, and develop subjectivities and identities embedded in networks of relationships that connect them simultaneously to two or more nation-states” (Basch, Glick Schiller and Szanton Blanc 1994, 7). Transnationalism recognizes settlement and ‘integration’ occur within the context of two or more locations, and that (new) identities are forged across this space.<sup>1</sup> As such, settlement and integration cannot be fully understood without consideration of the ongoing social, political and economic ties that are developed and maintained across the borders of the two states. Incorporating a transnational analysis recognizes that refugees retain and develop multiple relationships both within and between the sending and receiving countries. Processes of immigrant integration and emerging social cohesion in Canadian society may vary from large to small urban centres; across immigrant classes; and within specific immigrant groups.<sup>2</sup>

This paper examines the quality and distinctiveness of transnational links among Kosovars, a group that came to Canada as refugees in 1999. We contend that transnationalism is different for refugees than for other classes of immigrants, and note that the uncertain status of the Kosovars’ region of origin, namely Kosovo/a, shapes transnational relations as well as settlement and integration in BC.<sup>3</sup> Far from abandoning all ties with Kosovo/a, the Kosovars interviewed have established a

---

<sup>1</sup> Although the discourse of immigration uses words like ‘settlement’ and ‘integration’ unconsciously and unproblematically, these words imply certain assumptions that must be questioned when used in the context of transnational studies. Integration, for example, assumes a unidirectional process in which the language, culture and norms of the host society are seen to replace those of the country of origin. Transnationalism recognizes the relationships and identities are maintained with the country of origin and that settlement is shaped by relations within the context of both the country of origin and the host society.

<sup>2</sup> Immigration classes refer to specific categories of immigrants landed in Canada; they include ‘economic’, ‘family’, and ‘refugee’ (CIC 2002).

<sup>3</sup> In Kosovo/a, “political identities and territorial claims are contested between two cultures with very different languages” (Buckley 2000, 469). Kosovars and Serbians have different names for some places, and different spellings for others. These differences speak to different representations and understandings of these places. While this research focuses on Kosovar’s settlement in Canada, these differing representations of place have implications for the research here. The names and spellings that are employed reinscribe particular histories, understandings and ways of knowing, and ultimately affect the information that is obtained. During an interview one Kosovar asserted, “I thought you were saying Kosovo. Kosovo is more Serbian and Kosova or Kosove is okay” (Interview 103, Kosovar, Vancouver). Others, however, felt our use of Kosova was unnecessary as the province is internationally recognized as Kosovo. During the interview process Kosovars multitude of relationships and identities that extend beyond Canadian borders. Our findings suggest that the transnational linkages Kosovars in BC maintain with Kosovo/a do not necessarily detract from their ‘integration’ in Canada. Continued uncertainty in Kosovo/a may in fact hasten settlement in Canada.

Living Lives Across Space and Time

“The word ‘immigrant’ evokes images of permanent rupture, of the abandonment of old patterns of life and the painful learning of a new culture and often a new language” (Basch et al. 1994, 3-4). Although this conception envisions migrants as moving permanently from one bounded nation to another, others favour an “approach to migration that accents the attachments migrants maintain to families, communities, traditions and causes outside the boundaries of the nation-state to which they have moved” (Vertovec 2001, 574). Since the late 1980’s, researchers have theorized the ethnic and cultural identities and networks of economic, political, and cultural relations that cross national borders and boundaries. Proponents of transnationalism argue that settlement occurs within a context that simultaneously connects immigrants and refugees to multiple nation-states (Al-Ali and Koser 2002; Dona and Berry 1999; Dwyer 1999; Vertovec 1999; Portes 1997; Kearney 1995; Basch et al. 1994; Rouse 1992). Advances in transportation and communications technologies, and their increased accessibility facilitate migration and improved communications. Migrants develop relations and identities that are no longer anchored in one country, but rather span both their country of origin and resettlement (Vertovec 2001).

Basch, Glick Schiller, and Szanton Blanc (1994) define transnationalism as “the processes by which immigrants forge and sustain multi-stranded social relations that link together their societies of origin and settlement” (7). Portes (1999, 1997) extends this definition by arguing that transnational relations must be recurring activities that cross national borders and involve a significant number of people. This scale and intensity of relations, Portes asserts, differentiates transnational activities from those of earlier migrants (Portes 1997, Portes, Guarnizo and Landolt 1999). Critics of Portes, including Al-Ali and Koser (2002), contend that his insistence on “a significant number of people engaged in sustained relations over time” (2) as a prerequisite to transnational migration is too rigid.

Transnational approaches to migration research must fully consider the ways in which refugee transnationalism may differ from that of immigrant transnationalism (Al-Ali, Black and were asked to use whichever name they preferred. In our writing we have elected to use Kosovo/a, so as not to privilege either representation or way of knowing these places.

---

Koser 2001a, 2001b; Al-Ali and Koser 2002; Koser 2002). Forced migration is distinct from voluntary migration in the development of transnational relations.

[The] immediate concern of recent arrivals has been to try to secure their positions in their new host countries. Few have yet had time even to re-establish contacts with relatives and friends left behind ... far less become involved in transnational activities, even those as basic as sending remittances (Al-Ali et al. 2001a, 587).

Al-Ali et al. (2001a) distinguish 'transnational activities,' which may include political, economic, social and cultural activities at multiple scales from the individual to the institutional, from 'transnational capabilities,' which recognize that the ability to engage in transnational activities is dependent upon the resources available to migrants. The ability to engage in transnational activities in the 'home' country may be negatively affected by unemployment, financial instability and language barriers in the receiving country. This distinction is a useful extension to ideas forwarded by Portes (1997, 1999) and Portes et al. (1999) as it begins to take into consideration the actual ability of people to engage in transnational activities. Portes' research has historically focused on economic, voluntary migrants sending significant remittances.

Recently arrived refugees and immigrants, however, may not be in a position to engage in transnational activities. Sporadic remittances of money or gifts may represent the beginnings of transnational activities and relations for recent refugees who are struggling to establish themselves in the host society. The emergence of transnational activities will be affected by conditions both within the host and the sending country, and can vary over time and space depending on the attitudes of home states, differences in current status, and differences in conditions in home society (Al-Ali et al. 2001a).

Although much of the transnational literature focuses on economic activities, such as remittances (Portes 1997; Van Hear 2002; Vertovec 2001), and political activities (Basch et al. 1994), a few researchers have foregrounded social relations. Mountz and Wright (1996), for example, explore the ways in which transnational migration between San Augustan, Oaxaca, and Poughkeepsie, New York have altered the social practices of Mexican migrants in Poughkeepsie and their families in San Augustan. These authors show how transnational migration transforms social practices both in the sending and receiving countries. Although it is difficult to examine social relations without considering economic and political linkages, the least attention has been paid to the establishment and implications of transnational social practices.

Research Approach

Our research draws upon forty individual interviews and seven focus groups with Kosovar refugees, sponsors and key informants, that were conducted between May 2002 and March 2003, in seven BC communities: Chilliwack, Abbotsford, Kelowna, Vernon, Vancouver, Surrey and Burnaby. Approximately equal numbers of Kosovar men and women, aged 21 to 78, participated in this research. Because the English language ability of the Kosovar participants varied from those who claimed fluency in English, to those with little ability to speak English, interpreters were provided during focus groups and individual interviews. Using interpreters ensured people could respond in the language with which they felt the most comfortable. Although not generalizable, these findings expose the character and intensity of transnational processes among one refugee group, and have implications for settlement and integration.

The analysis of transnational relations and activities was included as one part of a study examining the settlement of Kosovar refugees who arrived in British Columbia during the summer of 1999 (see Sherrell and Hyndman 2004). Questions about transnational linkages were integrated into the research design to ascertain how, if at all, the development of multiple and complex linkages, be they economic, social or political, affect the settlement experiences of Kosovar refugees in British Columbia.

Heeding the criticisms of earlier studies of transnationalism, we posed questions related to transnational linkages to all participants in our study. Portes, Guarnizo and Landolt (1999) and Portes (2001), warn that transnational linkages are overdrawn by sampling only on the dependent variable, i.e. those who participate in transnational exchange. Hiebert and Ley (2003) also caution against this methodological pitfall. In their statistically significant survey of Vancouver immigrants, they add an important dimension to research on transnationalism: quantitative methods with arguably more generalizable results. Including questions about transnationalism on an interview schedule concerned primarily with settlement in smaller cities allowed us to ascertain whether transnationalism was relevant to the experiences of the refugees contacted. In other words, our sample is not skewed in favour of those for whom transnationalism is already important.

Distinguishing ‘Refugee Transnationalism’

Portes (1997) characterizes transnationalism as the formation of dense networks across political borders created by immigrants in their quest for economic advancement and social recognition. Through these networks, an increasing number of people are able to live dual lives. Participants are often bilingual, move easily between different cultures, frequently maintain homes in two centres, and pursue economic, political and cultural interests that require their presence in both” (812). Unlike migrants, who have prepared themselves to begin their lives in a new country, refugees have been forced to flee their homes and their country (Barrenechea 1995, Ryan and Woodill 2000; Mohamed 1999). As such, they may lack the financial resources and social networks that would hasten their integration. The majority of Kosovars interviewed, for example, would not meet the conditions outlined by Portes: few spoke English upon arrival in Canada, and most of Kosovars interviewed continue to find it difficult to move between countries for both economic and political reasons. Unemployment and underemployment, the high cost of travel to Kosovo/a, and lack of travel documents curtails the potential for people to travel directly to Kosovo/a or to make frequent returns.<sup>4</sup> Unlike the experiences of Bosnian and Eritrean refugees in the UK and the Netherlands (Al-Ali et al. 2001a, 2001b), however, the Kosovars could not rely on pre-existing networks established by earlier labour migrants as there were few Kosovars living in BC prior to 1999. Limited financial resources and political instability impair the ability of Kosovars to move freely between their country of origin and the host country. Their situation raises the question of whether ‘migrant transnationalism’ should be differentiated from that of ‘refugee transnationalism’.

Most immigrants and refugees who successfully apply to come to Canada have upwards of a year to prepare for their journey. Given efforts to ethnically cleanse Kosovo/a by the Milosevic regime, the Kosovars had little time to prepare for their departure.<sup>5</sup> Research undertaken in Alberta found that the average time between when Kosovars left their homes in Kosovo/a and their arrival in Canada was fifty-two days, compared to five years for non-Kosovar participants in the study (Abu-Laban, Derwing, Mulder and Northcott 2001). ‘Refugee transnationalism’ differs markedly from that of other immigrant classes because refugees are forced to leave their homes, often with little notice.

In employing the term ‘refugee transnationalism’ we recognize that competing discourses are embedded within the concept. ‘Refugee’ is a political and legal category framed by ‘international’ discourse focused on the relation of nation-states to one another. Refugees are outside the borders of their country, and are unable or unwilling to avail themselves of protection from their government. The idea of ‘refugee transnationalism’, however, reframes the category refugee as simultaneously embedded within both the country of origin and the host society to consider the ways in which refugees develop identities and form ongoing relationships. In this way the state is decentred as the only scale of analysis, but remains an important consideration in determining prospects for return.

---

<sup>4</sup> Without a Canadian passport, Kosovars are prohibited from traveling to Serbia and Montenegro. Consequently, those Kosovars who have visited Kosovo/a spoke of having traveled through Germany and Austria.

<sup>5</sup> Of the 850,000 ethnic Albanian Kosovars believed to have left the province to surrounding countries, approximately 250,000 fled to the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (Judah 2000, Calic 2000). The refugees threatened to upset the balance among ethnic groups in Macedonia, prompting a large-scale, United Nations (UN) sponsored humanitarian evacuation of Kosovar refugees from camps in Macedonia to states further afield.

Refugees have different motivations and resources available to them than do other migrants who may form transnational networks in a “quest for economic advancement and social recognition” (Portes 1997, 812). As such their relationships differ significantly from those of migrants who are socially and financially prepared to leave. Unlike many asylum seekers, whose immediate concerns are to establish themselves in their host country, the Kosovars benefited from being granted immediate recognition as refugees and legal status.<sup>6</sup> In this respect, the experiences of Kosovars differed from those of the Bosnians and Eritreans in England who expressed “concern and insecurity with respect to their legal status” (Al-Ali et al. 2001b, 628). In contrast, the Kosovars’ position in Canada is more certain than that in Kosovo/a. The war in Kosovo/a has not ended in the formation of an independent state, as it did for Bosnians and Eritreans, but rather in a “proto-independence” (Abu-Laban et al. 2001b, 628) as a temporary UN protectorate.

The UN Security Council resolution 1244 of June 10, 1999 led to the establishment of the UN mission in Kosovo, UNMIK; the resolution established a transitional administration but with no clear end status for Kosovo (UN Security Council 1999a). The preamble of the resolution reaffirms the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia over Kosovo; it calls for “self-administration” and “substantial autonomy”, but not a separate state. This stands in clear contrast, for example, with Security Council resolution 1272 for East Timor, which clearly stated that the aim of the UN transitional administration was to be a transition to an independent East Timor (UN Security Council 1999b). The effect of this resolution, in conjunction with political developments in Serbia and Montenegro (especially the removal of Mr. Milosevic as President), has served to heighten political uncertainty.

The character of this UN resolution has shaped Kosovo/a’s indeterminate political status. That is, Kosovar identification with Canada is not solely a product of the indigenous politics of Serbia and Montenegro. UN mandates and multilateral interventions into Kosovo have also played a part in shaping these transnational relationships albeit indirectly. In a sense, multilateral political relations among states and areas affected by conflict and ethnic cleansing shape transnational identity formation among displaced Kosovars now living in BC. The continued presence of the international peacekeeping Kosovo Force (KFOR) and the uncertain political fate of Kosovo/a (i.e. as a province of <sup>6</sup> All Kosovars were given the option of having a sponsor, and provisions were made for up to two years of income support, as well as coverage under the Interim Federal Health Plan (CIC 1999, Abu-Laban et al. 2001). In addition to the chance for immediate repatriation or permanent settlement in Canada, Kosovars were given a two year time-frame during which the Federal Government would assume full costs if they chose to repatriate (Tetrault & Tessier 1999, USCR 2000).

---

Serbia or an independent state) prolong this uncertainty and hasten settlement in Canada. 'Home' is marked with uncertainty about the political future.

Rebuilding Kosovo/a requires considerable investment, but several respondents felt it was impossible until there was political stability in the region, and clarity on its status. For one person, questions of citizenship are complicated by political uncertainty in Kosovo/a.

There is a real need in Kosovo for people who can help rebuild the economy, but the political status of Kosovo has not changed yet. So, you can't really rebuild an economy without an adequate solution to the political issues because you don't have the security for investment. Just recently there were elections for the parliament ... They say the president of Kosovo, but the president of what? President of the municipality or ... what is it? So without that the economy will never move forward. (Interview 303, Kosovar, Abbotsford).

For the past four years, "Kosovo has existed in a constitutional limbo ... At issue is whether the province will become independent or remain part of Serbia. The Kosovo Albanians want independence; the Serbs oppose it" (Glenny 2003). Initial talks between Kosovo's ethnic Albanian government and Serb-led Government were held on October 14, 2003 in Vienna (Reuters 2003). The continued political uncertainty has had economic consequences:

Nobody will put money in because they have no guarantee that the incoming government will not confiscate their investment. This has condemned the province to a commercial life that today consists of smuggling, subsistence farming and high unemployment (Glenny 2003).

In July 2003, for example, the unemployment rate in Kosovo/a was estimated at 57% (Helsingin Sanomat 2003). For one person who is going to school to upgrade previous qualifications, the job opportunities in Kosovo/a are scarce:

There is not too many opportunities over there because the war happened and everything is destroyed and lots of houses were burnt and factories. We don't have one factory over there that is working right now (Interview 144, Kosovar, Surrey).

Ongoing political uncertainty in Kosovo/a precludes the likelihood of a rapid solution to its economic crisis. "Factories lie dormant with little hope of investment. The UN says it must tackle standards before it can tackle Kosovo's final status. But without status, no-one knows what they are investing their money in" (Price 2003). Reflecting on a return visit to Kosovo/a, one informant noted "it was good to see family again, but the country was devastated" (Interview 303, Kosovars, Abbotsford). Talk about return is mitigated by the current devastation in Kosovo/a. Widespread unemployment and the absence of health care facilities make return much less desirable. The majority of Kosovars interviewed do not foresee a future there, at least in the immediate few years.

I am used to living with problems for last 10 years, but I have chance when Kosova get freedom I am sure I will find job then. Company called many times because you need to come we don't have like you, but I think when I came to Canada I would try to stay in Canada. I have no house now [in Kosovo/a]. I have nothing, and I know Kosova remain in bad situation for a long time. (Interview 109, Kosovar, Kelowna).

Although this person is not ruling out an eventual return to Kosovo/a, the current conditions prohibit immediate return. Life in Canada, despite unemployment for many, offers more possibilities than in Kosovo/a.<sup>7</sup>

Place and the Importance of Networks

Three years after their arrival in Canada, all of the Kosovars interviewed maintain ongoing contact with family and friends in Kosovo/a on a weekly, and in many cases a daily basis. Communication is mainly by phone and mail, although electronic means of exchange, such as email and internet messaging services have been important for Kosovars in major urban centres, particularly Vancouver. Similarly, Bosnian and Eritrean refugees in the UK, Germany and the Netherlands engage in regular contact with family in their respective home countries, primarily by phone, although a small number of Bosnians reported using the internet (Al-Ali et al. 2001b). In addition to phone calls and letters, the internet has been an important news source that has enabled Kosovars to stay abreast of daily events in Kosovo/a. Kosovars interviewed in Vancouver, in particular, regularly use computers (others in Kelowna, Chilliwack, Abbotsford and Surrey as well). One Kosovar stated:

Through Internet is everything available. You can search anything you want – radio, TV, theatres, political situation, economy, everything. Also there is phone calls, through talking to people and messenger. They will tell us what's new, what's good, what's bad (Interview 103, Kosovar, Vancouver).

Weekly internet newspapers and online news agencies that are published in Albanian have allowed the Kosovars to monitor current events. In Vernon, where the Kosovars we interviewed were not computer literate, the employment counsellor at the local immigrant and refugee-serving agency would print out the weekly online newspaper for them. The Albanian-speaking Kosovar diaspora spans the globe, the dispersion being primarily a result of the 1999 exodus. When asked if he kept in contact with people in Kosovo/a, one Kosovar in Vancouver stated:

Every day and every night. Homesick all the time ... Usually first we start with phones, but usually now with the internet. Every day. Like we have ... [a] specified time where we meet each other. We waiting each other to contact ... It's amazing

---

<sup>7</sup> For the Kosovars in BC, significant variations exist between centres in relation to both unemployment and attachment to the labour force. Some Kosovars, particularly in the Lower Mainland spoke of fairly constant attachment to the labour force, albeit in a variety of jobs, while the majority of participants in Kelowna and Vernon spoke of having worked for as little as one or two months since coming to Canada. (see Sherrell and Hyndman 2004).

some of the things that keep me here because I can feel it. I'm many times, I play some music and Albanian music, with all kind of actors and singers and stuff. That's keeping me really ... healthful. It keeps me all the time in life. Like ... I can make utmost for life. I am home (Interview 101, Kosovar, Vancouver).

Home then is not bounded by the borders of one province or country but simultaneously exists across the borders of both Kosovo/a and Canada. Even as they struggle to build new lives in Canada, many Kosovars maintain ongoing linkages with Kosovo/a. Over time, however, some Kosovars indicated they have begun to look at the news less frequently than they did three years earlier when they first arrived.

[I] used to [keep up with the news], but not anymore ... [Unless] someone mentions something ... I don't usually search for news (Interview 130, Kosovar, Chilliwack).

Settlement requires establishing new livelihoods in a new location and often in a different language.

Migration and settlement force people to negotiate new identities which are not bounded by the borders of a single nation-state. How are these evolving transnational identities important in relation to participation in Canadian society? Like the Bosnians studied by Al-Ali et al. (2001a), 'being Kosovar' "governs many people's sense of identity and sense of belonging" (591). In spite of their commitment to obtaining Canadian citizenship, respondents confirmed having multiple identities.

In Canada I identify myself as an Albanian ... but I ... stopped in Austria on the way ... [to visit] Kosova, and I leaned more towards identifying myself as a Canadian there ... I'm not sure [why], maybe just the politics that's been going on there ... [interviewer – maybe it felt safer] ... safe ... not much safer, but I don't know, sometimes we're embarrassed too. Because not everyone understands. You know, they judge you by that thing (Interview 130, Kosovar, Chilliwack).

Identity is relational, especially with regard to place. One woman who originally settled in the United States suggested:

Actually I feel more American than Albanian [be]cause I miss more New York than my country ... My family is there and I [have] lots of friends in New York ... and I haven't been to Kosova in three years ... Where the family is, the heart is (Interview 110, Kosovar, Vancouver).

One Kosovar suggested the passing of time in Canada could change his/her identity.

I have ... a lot of contact with people [from Kosovo/a that have been] here fifteen years ... [When] I say I am from Kosovo, they say, I was saying that but now I saying now Vancouver is my home, or Canada is my home ... Probably what is true if I am staying here 15 years, 20 years then its different, then lose all contacts with my people back home and probably then, after 10, 15 years I belong, I am from here, but its difficult to adjust right now (Interview 101, Kosovar, Vancouver).

For another person, Canadian citizenship is imagined as being a new aspect of their identity as Kosovar.

[I am a] Kosovar but [I am a] landed immigrant in Canada. That is that. But when I think of myself I am Kosovar. And I'm going to be ... [as long as] I'm alive. Even if I get Canadian citizenship ... I am citizen of Canada ... and I really appreciate that. But I'm still Albanian ..., Kosovar from Kosova (Interview 131, Kosovar, Chilliwack).

Integration into Canadian society, then, is imagined as 'becoming Canadian' while still maintaining Kosovar identity and culture.<sup>8</sup> Becoming Canadian, then, represents a facet of a continuously emerging identity. Another person talked about increasingly feeling like he had a home in both Kosovo/a and Canada.

If I was born here, maybe [it] would be different ... but I was born over there ... So it's hard for me to say ... I'm Canadian yet. But I feel like ... I have home here too ... When I went [to Kosovo/a] for two months last year. It was kind of pushing me sometimes to go back there. Pulling me to come over here ... I see myself like 50-50 (Interview 132, Kosovar, Chilliwack).

The establishment and maintenance of transnational social relations reconceptualizes notions of 'home' (as stretching across space) and encourages the renegotiation of identity, both an individual and a culturally distinct group that shares a language.

In order to avoid the necessity of starting over, one family has elected to take advantage of a provision within Canada's Resettlement Assistance Program (RAP) that enables students to travel back to the country of origin. This enables the couple to travel "back and forth to school without stopping their landing in Canada" (Interview 201, Service provider, Vancouver). As such, this family lives in Kosovo/a during the school year and then in Canada during summer breaks. Despite feelings of indifference towards Kosovo/a, dividing time between the two countries has distinct personal advantages for this family: continued progress towards professional accreditation in Kosovo/a (after which the person intends to write qualifying exams in Canada), and continued progress towards obtaining Canadian citizenship. The degree to which Kosovars have developed transnational social relations and identities varies significantly, however, within the population interviewed. Evidence does point to the existence of tight transnational social networks among the Kosovars interviewed. Interest in news 'back home' has waned for some and may well decline further over time.<sup>9</sup> Although only one person talked about being in contact with Kosovars in other Canadian cities, there appears to be a rich network of information concerning living and employment conditions in these cities.

---

<sup>8</sup> The ability to integrate and maintain identity and culture is guaranteed under Canada's Multiculturalism Policy, which does not require newcomers to assimilate and forego previous identities.

Transnational Capacities

As they negotiate settlement in Canada, many of the Kosovars interviewed expressed the desire to help family members still living in Kosovo/a by sending money. Unemployment and underemployment, as well as the high costs of living in BC, however, have prevented many of the Kosovars from sending regular remittances. These findings differ significantly from those of Al-Ali et al. (2001b) who reported that the majority of Bosnians and Eritreans they interviewed were sending regular remittances to family and friends in Bosnia and Eritrea.<sup>10</sup> The perceived obligation to send money to help with daily living expenses in Kosovo/a has required some Kosovars to make personal sacrifices here in Canada.

[W]e have like obligation to help them. Doesn't matter if I am suffering here, we have that respect and need to help them ... My family ... is suffering. We need to ... help them. We have that responsibility. [It] doesn't matter how. You working hard here or you don't have [money] to go to spend ... You need to have money [to send home] (Interview 101, Kosovar, Vancouver).

Men, in particular, expressed a social obligation to help support parents in Kosovo/a.

Usually parents ... choose one of the children [and] he have responsibility to support them and to live with them to the end (Interview 101, Kosovar, Vancouver).

The sacrifices made to help those in Kosovo/a obviously shape the social activities Kosovars can participate in here in Canada. In their work with Bosnian refugees, Al-Ali et al. (2001b) found “[t]hose with additional income ... are often faced with a choice between saving money to return, supporting their family in Bosnia, or starting to build a new life in the host country” (628). Nonetheless, family and friends are in their thoughts; the stress of trying to make ends meet in BC is compounded by the acute housing and income needs of those left behind.

Currently, only three families out of 24 send semi-regular remittances of $500-1000 every three to six months to family and friends living in Kosovo/a. Many of the Kosovars interviewed

---

<sup>9</sup> Longitudinal research on transnational relations could illuminate the extent to which transnational relations may be a short or medium-term strategy for settlement, but such analysis is beyond the scope of this study.

<sup>10</sup> It is important to note that all adult Eritreans in the diaspora are obliged to remit 2% of their annual incomes to the Eritrean state (Koser 1999). Although Kosovars in the diaspora have not been subjected to the institutionalized ‘transnationalism from above’, Prime Minister Bajram Rexhepi, has begun to encourage members of the diaspora to utilize their business experience that has been obtained outside of Kosovo/a with their ‘special knowledge’ of Kosovo/a to help rebuild Kosovo/a’s economy (Reimer and Howell 2002). Despite the prevalence of informal remittances, the government is encouraging economic ties that will help begin the process of rebuilding (thus moving from “transnationalism from below” (driven by migrants) to “transnationalism from above” (driven by government)).

indicated they send sporadic gifts of money or clothes because they are not in a position to send regular remittances.<sup>11</sup>

I send [gifts to] ... my brother and sister ... Sometimes I wish I could send more, but now [there is] ... not enough for me here (Interview 130, Kosovar, Chilliwack).

The inability to send regular remittances to Kosovo/a increases the stress of settlement in Canada.

Like $20 or $50 dollars just to say hi, and that I don't forget you. It is not big money ... I have my uncle [and] my cousin ... their houses were burnt and for winter they don't have a house. They sleep in a tent and the winter it is -25 or -30 sometimes. These poor people have nothing. No roof, no house, no nothing: they sleep outside ... I cannot help them even if I want [to]. It is very hard and sad (Interview 144, Kosovar, Surrey).

Remittances that are sent to friends and family living in Kosovo/a are delivered through informal networks as opposed to through formal transfer systems, such as Western Union. As people return for visits, others will send money or gifts for friends and family in Kosovo/a.

Keeping options open

As Kosovars become eligible, questions about their desire to obtain Canadian citizenship were posed. Although the Kosovars interviewed are at differing stages of their eligibility (some were not eligible to apply, while others had already applied at the time of the interview), they were unanimous about their intention to have Canadian citizenship: it offers security and facilitates mobility. Speaking of a Canadian passport, one respondent noted,

[I] want it so I can visit Kosova, currently [I] can't without lots of visas, and [we are] prohibited from travel in Yugoslavia, [but I] want to travel to Kosova (Interview 107, Kosovar, Vernon).

Upon receiving Canadian citizenship, one family repatriated to Kosovo/a to rebuild their lives. Canadian citizenship, in this example, acts as a form of insurance: if this family can not forge a livelihood upon their return to Kosovo/a, they may choose to return to Canada.<sup>12</sup> Kosovars “[k]eep their options open” (Glick Schiller, Basch and Blanc-Szanton 1992, 12) by maintaining access to multiple nation-states and thus increasing stability and security. This raises interesting questions about whether other people will return to Kosovo/a after obtaining their Canadian citizenship, and in <sup>11</sup> Although the sporadic gifts of money or clothes do not meet Portes' (1999) definition of transnationalism, we contend they expose transnational social fields that continuously link Kosovars in Canada with those 'at home'.

<sup>12</sup> Anecdotal evidence indicates that many of the Kosovars who returned to Kosovo/a within the two year window for repatriation are unhappy with their decision. For those who have remained in Canada, Canadian citizenship offers new opportunities. Deciding whether to remain in Canada or return to Kosovo/a with a turn, what kind of citizens they will become in relation to Canadian society.<sup>13</sup> While beyond the scope of this paper, this issue has been widely addressed among economic immigrants to Canada (Waters 2001), but not among refugees.

Formal political involvement in Kosovo/a, through voting, is highly variable among the Kosovars interviewed.<sup>14</sup> Although only five Kosovars, out of thirty-four, indicated that they had voted in the 2002 elections in Kosovo/a, over fifty percent of the Kosovars interviewed say they intend to vote in future Kosovar elections.<sup>15</sup> Approximately thirty percent of the Kosovars interviewed, however, have no intention of voting in Kosovo/a in the future. Reflecting on his knowledge of local issues and candidates at home in Kosovo/a, one Kosovar reasoned “I don’t know most of the people who are running ... my vote would be [an] uneducated one” (Interview 120, Kosovar, Abbotsford). Geography also played a role in the decision whether or not to vote in Kosovar elections. “I’m here now and probably will not vote” (Interview 121, Kosovar, Abbotsford). One Kosovar related his parent’s inability to vote in Kosovo/a as they lack updated documentation to prove they are citizens of Kosovo/a.

I can [vote] but my parents cannot ... because they didn’t have updated information ... It is really very frustrating there trying to get all the information that you lived there but the thing is that you cannot because everything is destroyed (Interview 111, Kosovar, Vancouver).

Judah (2000) reports that as the Kosovars fled, the police stripped most refugees of their documents ... [I]n this way Milosevic may have hoped to make it impossible for them to come home later as they would have no way of proving that they were Yugoslav, as opposed to Albanian or Macedonian citizens (251).

These factors increase the difficulty of proving former Yugoslavian citizenship and problematize voting prospects. In contrast, all of those who apply for Canadian citizenship are likely to get it. While voting is not an arduous level of political participation, it does signal the Kosovars’ priorities and intentions to vote in Canada. Connections to Canada already appear stronger on some counts.

---

Canadian passport in hand is analgous to the economic process of locational rationalization forwarded by Taylor and Thrift (1986, see Sherrell and Hyndman 2004).

<sup>13</sup> The proposed addition of questions relating to the reasons for taking up Canadian citizenship (or not) on Wave 3 of the Longitudinal Survey of Immigrants to Canada (LSIC), speaks to Government recognition of more strategic approaches to Canadian citizenship, something which has definite long-term implications for policy (Ruddick 2004).

<sup>14</sup> The International Organization Migration (IOM) organizes elections, and Kosovars are eligible to vote if they obtain cards from Austria.

<sup>15</sup> In contrast, almost all of the Kosovars interviewed indicated their intention to vote in Canada once they are eligible.

Conclusion: Constitutive Outsides

Settlement and integration occur within the context of a nexus of social, political and economic relations that simultaneously connect immigrants and refugees to multiple nation-states. Unlike many asylum seekers and refugees with temporary status, whose immediate energies are focused on obtaining status in the host country, the Kosovars in Canada benefited significantly from being granted immediate recognition legal status, and basic support. For the Kosovars, their status in Canada is far more certain than it is in Serbia and Montenegro.

Continued political and economic uncertainty in Kosovo/a is due in part to the nature of the UN resolution which authorized multilateral intervention in Kosovo/a. Kosovo/a's future remains uncertain, and this appears to have the effect of hastening settlement in Canada for Kosovar refugees. The inability to foresee a future at 'home' in Kosovo/a in the next five to ten years has meant that Kosovars in Canada plan to stay and have begun to establish a future for themselves. 'Home' in Kosovo/a is marked with an uncertain economic and political future.

For some, Canadian citizenship offers security and a new beginning in a new country. For others it offers mobility and the opportunity to visit Kosovo/a without restrictions, but with an 'insurance policy' of return to Canada. For most, Canada offers better economic and political prospects than Kosovo/a, at least in the medium term. The transnational ties, identities, and relationships forged between Kosovo/a and British Columbia shape the daily lives of the Kosovars in BC. The establishment and maintenance of transnational relations has resulted in a reconstitution of 'home' for the Kosovars interviewed. 'Home' is a social field that straddles the borders of both BC and Kosovo/a.

The transnational identities and relationships developed between Kosovo/a and Canada, and among members of the diaspora, are an expression of extant social networks with family and friends. While modest, these networks are also the spaces in which remittances and gifts circulate. In BC, ample evidence points to the existence of transnational information networks. Our methods allowed us to document transnational 'traffic' but not to measure whether this 'traffic' wanes over time as integration in Canada proceeds.

While we cannot definitively prove that transnationalism augments settlement and integration in the Canadian context, neither did we find evidence to suggest that it detracts from participation in BC and Canadian society. Indeed, the uncertain political status in Kosovo/a appears to act as a 'constitutive outside' (Mouffe 1995), constituting Kosovars as Canadian to a greater extent because their status in Serbia and Montenegro is uncertain and unattractive.<sup>16</sup> Nonetheless, attachments and belonging to more than one place makes 'home' difficult to define. Even as he plans a future for his family in Canada, one Kosovar lamented

I'm Albanian. Born Albanian, and Albanian I'll die. My heart is there ... I have no way of helping them in any way, but ... that's my country and that's my homeland (Interview 106, through interpreter, Kosovar, Vernon).

In the absence of political stability and economic security in Kosovo/a in the foreseeable future, a home in Canada offers more certainty and opportunities to the Kosovars.

Summary of Relevant Findings

1. Where political conditions in one's region of origin cease to be favourable for return, integration in host state is likely to proceed more 'rapidly'.
2. The uncertain political status in Kosovo/a appears to act as a 'constitutive outside', making Kosovars identify more as Canadians than they would if return to Kosovo/a was desirable and secure.

---

<sup>16</sup> 'Constitutive outside' recognizes identities as being relational and describes the demarcation of an identity through the establishment of a hierarchy, i.e. self-other, us-them (Mouffe 1995). In recognizing difference, an 'us' as from a 'them, Mouffe points to the potential for an antagonistic, and political, relationship between the identities.

References

- Abu-Laban, B., T. Derwing, M. Mulder, and H.C. Northcott 2001. Lessons learned: An evaluation of Northern Alberta's experience with Kosovar refugees. University of Alberta. Prairie Centre of Excellence for Research on Immigration and Integration and Population Research Laboratory.
- Al-Ali, N. 2002. Trans- or a-national? Bosnian refugees in the UK and the Netherlands. In New Approaches to Migration: Transnational communities and the transformation of home, ed. N. Al-Ali. and K. Koser, 96–117. New York, Routledge.
- Al-Ali, N., and K. Koser. 2002. Transnationalism, international migration and home. In New Approaches to Migration: Transnational communities and the transformation of home, ed. N. Al-Ali. and K. Koser, 1–14. New York, Routledge.
- Al-Ali, N., R. Black and K. Koser 2001a. The limits to 'transnationalism': Bosnian and Eritrean refugees in Europe as emerging transnational communities. Ethnic and Racial Studies 24(4):578–600.
- . 2001b. Refugees and transnationalism: The experience of Bosnians and Eritreans in Europe. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies 27(4):615–34.
- Barrenechea, A.M. 1995. Under many fires: The lives of women refugees Canadian Woman Studies: les cahiers de la femme 15(2–3):1–33.
- Basch, L., N. Glick Schiller and C. Szanton Blanc. 1994. Nations Unbound: Transnational Projects, Postcolonial Predicaments, and Deterritorialized Nation-States. New York: Gordon and Breach Publishers.
- Buckley, W.J. (ed.) 2000. Kosovo: Contending Voices on Balkan Interventions. Grand Rapids: William B. Eerdmans.
- Calic, M.-J. 2000. Kosovo in the twentieth century: A historical account. In Kosovo and the Challenge of Humanitarian Intervention: Selective Indignation, Collective Action, and International Citizenship, ed. A. Schnabel, and R. Thakur, 19–31. New York: United Nations University Press.
- Citizenship and Immigration Canada. 2002. Canada's Immigration Law. Ottawa: CIC.
- Dona, G. and J. W. Berry. 1999. Refugee acculturation and re-acculturation. In Refugees: Perspectives on the Experience of Forced Migration, ed. A. Ager, 169–95. New York: Pinter.
- Dwyer, C. 1999. Chapter 30: Migrations and diasporas. In Introducing Human Geographies, ed. P. Cloke, P. Crang and M. Goodwin, 287–95. New York: Arnold.
- Glenny, M. 2003. Asleep at the wheel in Kosovo: The EU is wasting the chance to bring lasting peace to the Balkans. The Guardian, September 9.
- Glick Schiller, N., L. Basch, and C. Blanc-Szanton 1992. Transnationalism: A new analytic framework for understanding migration. In Towards a Transnational Perspective on Migration: Race, class, ethnicity and nationalism reconsidered. Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences, 645:1–24.
- Heibert, D. and D. Ley 2003. Characteristics of Immigrant Transnationalism in Vancouver. Working Paper No. 03-15. Vancouver: RIIM.
- Helsingin Sanomat. 2003. Appointment of Harri Holkeri as Kosovo administrator confirmed. Helsingin Sanomat: International Edition, July 29.

- Hyndman, J. and M. Walton-Roberts 2000. Interrogating borders: A transnational approach to refugee research in Vancouver. The Canadian Geographer 3: 244–58.
- Judah, T. 2000. Kosovo: War and Revenge. London: Yale University Press.
- Kearney, M. 1995. The local and the global: The anthropology of globalization and transnationalism. Annual Review of Anthropology 24: 547–65.
- Koser, K. 1999. From refugees to transnational communities? Paper presented at the Conference on ‘New Approaches to Migration: Transnational Communities and the Transformation of Home.’ University of Sussex, 21–22 September 1999.
- . 2002. From refugees to transnational communities? In New Approaches to Migration: Transnational Communities and the Transformation of Home, ed. N. Al-Ali. and K. Koser, 139–52. New York: Routledge.
- Mohamed, H. S. 1999. Resistance strategies: Somali women’s struggles to reconstruct their lives in Canada. Canadian Woman Studies – les cahiers de la femme 19(3):52–57.
- Mouffe, C. 1994. For a politics of nomadic identity. In Travellers’ Tales: Narratives of Home and Displacement, ed. G. Robertson, M. Mash, L. Tickner, J. Bird, B. Curtis and T. Putnam, 105–13. New York: Routledge.
- Mountz, A. and R. A. Wright 1996. Daily life in the transnational migrant community of San Agustín, Oaxaca, and Poughkeepsie, New York. Diaspora 5(3):403–27.
- Portes, A. 1997. Immigration theory for a new century: Some problems and opportunities. International Migration Review 31(4):799–825
- . 1999. Conclusion: Towards a new world – the origins and effects of transnational activities Ethnic and Racial Studies 22(2):464–77.
- . 2001. Introduction: The debates and significance of immigrant transnationalism. Global Networks 1:181–93.
- Portes, A., L.E. Guarnizo, P. Landolt. 1999. The study of transnationalism: Pitfalls and promise or an emergent research field? Ethnic and Racial Studies 22(2):217–37.
- Price, M. 2003. Kosovo’s deep divide. BBC News, World Edition. October 13.
- Reimers, T. and S. Howell. 2002. US diaspora keen to invest. Focus Kosovo – Economy, October.
- Reuters. 2003. “Serbia, Kosovo talks now weeks away”– U.N. governor. Reuters AlertNet, September 9.
- Rouse, R. 1992. Making sense of settlement: Class transformation, cultural struggle and transnationalism among Mexican migrants to the United States. Annals of the New York Academy of Science 645: 25–52.
- Ruddick, E. 2004. Longitudinal survey of immigrants to Canada: Report on activities. Presentation given at RIIM/MCAWS Immigration Research Workshop. February 24, 2004, SFU Harbour Centre, Vancouver.
- Ryan, L. and J. Woodill 2000. A Search for Home: Refugee Voices in the Romero House Community. Toronto: CERIS.
- Sherrell, K. and J. Hyndman. 2004. Sharing the wealth, spreading the ‘burden’? The settlement of Kosovar refugees in smaller BC cities. Working Paper No. 04-06. Vancouver: RIIM.
- Taylor, M.J. and N. Thrift (eds). 1986. Multinationals and the Restructuring of the World Economy. London: Croom Helm.

- Tetrault, E. and L. Tessier 1999. Notes for a statement by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, The Honourable Lucienne Robillard, on the Return of Kosovar Refugees. CIC Canada News Release 1999-28, July 2, Montreal.
- United Nations Security Council. 1999a. Resolution 1244 (1999). Adopted by the Security Council at its 4011th meeting on 10 June 1999.
- . 1999b. Resolution 1272 (1999). Adopted by the Security Council at its 4057th meeting on 25 October 1999.
- USCR. 2000. Canada. World Refugee Survey 2000: An annual assessment of conditions affecting refugees, asylum seekers, and internally displaced persons. Immigration and Refugee Services of America 295, 297–99.
- Van Hear, N. 2002. Sustaining societies under strain: Remittances as a form of transnational exchange in Sri Lanka and Ghana. In New Approaches to Migration: Transnational communities and the transformation of home, ed. N. Al-Ali. and K. Koser, 202–23. New York: Routledge.
- Vertovec, S. 1999. Conceiving and researching transnationalism. Ethnic and Racial Studies 22(2):447–62.
- . 2001. Transnationalism and identity. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies 27(4):573–82.
- Waters, J.L. 2001. The flexible family: Recent immigration and ‘Astronaut’ households in Vancouver, British Columbia. Working Paper No. 01-02. Vancouver: RIIM.

No.	Author(s)	Title	Date
03-01	David Ley	Offsetting Immigration and Domestic Migration I Gateway Cities: Canadian and Australian Reflections on an 'American Dilemma'	01/03
03-02	Don DeVoretz and Kangqing Zhang	Citizenship, Passports and the Brain Exchange Triangle	01/03
03-03	Johanna L. Waters and Sin Yih Teo	Social and Cultural Impacts of Immigration: An Examination of the Concept of 'Social Cohesion' with Implications for British Columbia	01/03
03-04	June Beynon, Roumiana Ilieva, and Marelá Dichupa	"Do you know your language?" How Teachers of Punjabi and Chinese Ancestries Construct their Family Languages in their Personal and Professional Lives	01/03
03-05	Daniel Hiebert, Jock Collins, and Paul Spoonley	Uneven Globalization: Neoliberal Regimes, Immigration, and Multiculturalism in Australia, Canada, and New Zealand	02/03
03-06	Daniel Hiebert	Are Immigrants Welcome? Introducing the Vancouver Community Studies Survey	03/03
03-07	Yan Shi	The Impact of Canada's Immigration Act on Chinese Independent Immigrants	04/03
03-08	Roger Andersson	Settlement Dispersal of Immigrants and Refugees in Europe: Policy and Outcomes	03/03
03-09	Daniel Hiebert and Ravi Pendakur	Who's Cooking? The Changing Ethnic Division of Labour in Canada, 1971-1996	03/03
03-10	Seriy Pivnenko and Don DeVoretz	Economic Performance of Ukrainian Immigrants in Canada and the United States	03/03
03-11	Don J. DeVoretz, Seriy Pivnenko, Diane Coulombe	The Immigrant Triangle: Québec, Canada and the Rest of the World	05/03
03-12	David W. Edgington, Michael A. Goldberg, and Thomas A. Hutton	The Hong Kong Chinese in Vancouver	04/03
03-13	Margaret Walton-Roberts and Geraldine Pratt	Mobile Modernities: One South Asian Family Negotiates Immigration, Gender and Class	09/03
03-14	Leonie Sandercock	Rethinking Multiculturalism for the 21 st Century	10/03
03-15	Daniel Hiebert and David Ley	Characteristics of Immigrant Transnationalism in Vancouver	10/03
03-16	Sin Yih Teo	Imagining Canada: The Cultural Logics of Migration Amongst PRC Immigrants	10/03
03-17	Daniel Hiebert, Lisa Oliver and Brian Klinkenberg	Immigration and Greater Vancouver: A 2001 Census Atlas (Online format only)	10/03
03-18	Geraldine Pratt (in collaboration with The Philippine Women Centre)	From Migrant to Immigrant: Domestic Workers Settle in Vancouver, Canada	11/03

03-19	Paul Spoonley	The Labour Market Incorporation of Immigrants in Post-Welfare New Zealand	11/03
03-20	Leonie Sandercock	Integrating Immigrants: The Challenge for Cities, City Governments, and the City-Building Professions	12/03
04-01	Rosa Sevy and John Torpey	Commemoration, Redress, and Reconciliation in the Integration of Immigrant Communities: The Cases of Japanese-Canadians and Japanese-Americans	02/04
04-02	Don DeVoretz and Sergiy Pivnenko	Immigrant Public Finance Transfers: A Comparative Analysis by City	02/04
04-03	Margaret Walton-Roberts	Regional Immigration and Dispersal: Lessons from Small- and Medium-sized Urban Centres in British Columbia	02/04
04-04	Don J. DeVoretz, Sergiy Pivnenko, and Morton Beiser	The Economic Experiences of Refugees in Canada	02/04
04-05	Isabel Dyck	Immigration, Place and Health: South Asian Women's Accounts of Health, Illness and Everyday Life	02/04
04-06	Kathy Sherrell, Jennifer Hyndman and Fisnik Preniqi	Sharing the Wealth, Spreading the "Burden"? The Settlement of Kosovar Refugees in Smaller B.C. Cities	02/04
04-07	Nicolas Marceau and Steeve Mongrain	Interjurisdictional Competition in Law Enforcement	03/04
04-08	Shibao Guo	Responding to the Changing Needs of the Chinese Community in Vancouver: The Contribution of SUCCESS (1973-1998)	04/04
04-09	Amanda Aizlewood & Ravi Pendakur	Ethnicity and Social Capital in Canada	04/04

For information on papers previous to 2003, please see our Website

<http://www.riim.metropolis.net/research/policy>

Back issues of working papers are available for $5 from

Vancouver Centre of Excellence: Immigration, WMX4653, Simon Fraser University, 8888 University Drive, Burnaby, B.C, Canada V5A 1S6. Tel: (604) 291-4575 Fax: (604) 291-5336

E-mail: riim@sfu.ca

<http://www.riim.metropolis.net/>